

LINDA GUNTER specializes in the nuclear power-nuclear weapons connection, the myths surrounding the French nuclear program and in human rights and the nuclear fuel chain. In addition she works on media and development. With her husband, Paul Gunter, she co-authored the 2001 landmark report, Licensed to Kill, exposing the high toll taken on animal life – especially endangered sea turtles – due to the routine operation of coastal nuclear reactors. She is one of the featured women in For the Greater Good: Women's Work in the 21st Century – a project of photographer/philanthropist, Friedricke Merck. Prior to her environmental advocacy work Linda was for 20 years a journalist and award-winning public relations professional. As a journalist she wrote for Reuters, The Times (UK), The New York Times and numerous newspapers and magazines and was a broadcaster with the USA and Prime television networks. She has a blog on the Daily Kos. Linda is British born, speaks Italian and French and has traveled widely internationally.
