Proposal
Ex Endogenous
A Proposal for the 2012 Venice Architecture Biennale

“[W]hat we understand as building or see as...urban landscape is just this sort of middle zone...that given ingredient which is somewhat useful and obedient, but is really just the beginning of speculations about what could be beyond.”
Gordon Matta-Clark

Ex Endogenous is an exhibition concept that will take advantage of a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for the Australian Pavilion while at the same time revealing the creative undercurrents reimagining the practice of architecture in Australia today. Its primary act is both homage to an iconic structure and a challenge to the stasis of traditional exhibitions; its secondary act is the exposition of new directions in the practice of Australian architecture. Its fabric is architecture and landscape; its composition is inhabitative and experiential; its content responsive and interpretive.

The Pavilion will become a landscape, or series of landscapes. Within these newly created (yet utterly familiar) territories will be spaces of encounter; and within these spaces, intimate engagement with the working processes of a selection of Australian architectural practices.

Having moved beyond the stereotypical contrasts of (and obeisance to) the artificially urban and the picturesque rural, the discourse of Australian architecture nevertheless needs to embrace more integrally the architecture of its middle ground. Australia’s pre-occupation tends towards the extremes, but our architecture needs to address instead that vast littoral between the deliberate high density of our city centres and the vacancy of the interior – the terrain where 90% of Australians live, and where scarcely any architects practice.

Fortunately, transcending any cultural barriers between the perceived elitism of architectural production and the man in the street is the genuine shared sybaritic delight in the spatial relationships we concoct and inhabit between our interiors and the landscape around us, whether urban, rural or, more likely, suburban. Our society focuses on the common inhabitation of exterior spaces, within which we are all able to become the individual authors of our own experiences. It remains a responsibility of architecture to develop the means by which we can “publish” (which is to say share) those moments.

Architecture as an instrument to reveal an interior realm, conjugating what is within with what exists beyond, becomes a platform in which these stories of the making of a new Australian architecture can be told. Ex Endogenous will facilitate a renewed engagement between heretofore only propinquitous partners: between the Pavilion and the surrounding Giardini; between the visitor and the message; and between some of the most innovative intellects working in our discipline and their audiences.

Office Baroque, Gordon Matta-Clark 1977
View of Main Exhibition Space Looking Toward Riva del Partigiani
The existing Australian Pavilion is scheduled to be demolished in the near future, to be replaced with a new building. Rather than envisaging the demolition of the pavilion as an anonymous and sombre event, we propose to make the act an exploration and celebration of the structure and its surrounding site. Using as its raw materials the fabric of the existing Australian Pavilion itself, a novel series of exhibition spaces will be constructed via the following processes:

- Cut – excisions of various wall, floor and roof panels of the pavilion.
- Form – creation of gardens, thresholds and interstitial spaces within and around the resulting incisions.
- Inhabitation – installations within these liminal spaces that form the intellectual content of the exhibition.

The Ex Endogenous team will work with landscape architects¹ in the creation of the garden spaces throughout the newly perforated Pavilion: spaces open to sky, open to water, open to the Giardini and, finally, open to speculation.

The dynamic landscapes created through these interventions – one of gaps, shifted contexts and improvisations – will host an exhibition that takes a cross-section through similarly creative Australian architectural practices. The newly reconstructed pavilion will be the perfect host for practices that are developing new modes of spatial agency – through constructing artefacts, making policy, transforming space, teaching, publishing, networking and more.²

Ranging from large to small, from urban to rural, from local to global, the way these practices contribute to reimagining architecture will, like the Pavilion, be investigated through processes that reconceptualise and recontextualise the object they work on. An intense mapping and surveying of milieu will reveal some of the alternative approaches to architectural practice that are emerging in Australia, with a range of visualisations and stories about their very rooms, relationships, rhythms, sounds and sites being used to capture new Australian architectures of practice.³

It is within the interstitial spaces of the verandah, the garden, the courtyard, the deck, that we encounter each other, and conduct our exchanges. Ex Endogenous will turn the inside out, and invite participants on a journey to that inner realm that exists in our suburbs, in our studios, and in the minds of our most progressive architectural practices.

"At first the mother thought she had misheard, but when she described the inner courtyard of her own home, the...woman smiled and nodded. "Yes, yes, every house here has the inner courtyard, if you can find it. Very strange, you know, because nowhere else has this thing. No other country."

Shaun Tan, Tales from Outer Suburbia

1. Either working with one or several Landscape Architecture firms, the exhibition is an opportunity to collaborate with a discipline that should, by rights, be included in any consideration of Australian architecture. Cross disciplinary support may then also become available.
2. The fluidity of these exhibitors will also allow the Pavilion curation to respond to the International Director’s theme when announced. Stage One of the work is the manipulation of the Pavilion; Stage Two the physical insertions into the spaces by the selected practices; Stage Three the content they present, which will then directly address the greater Biennale theme.
3. The exhibition can be relocated both domestically and internationally by extending the same processes developed in the Giardini for the Biennale. Any eventual tour presents an ideal opportunity to work with a local building and with local practices to create a series of garden spaces within which the easily transportable artefacts and ideas of the contributing firms will be re-presented.

The Right to the City, 2011 - ongoing

The Right to The City is an ongoing project centred on enabling urban criticism and creativity. It commenced in April 2011 with an exhibition at Sydney’s Tin Sheds Gallery, bringing together an important group of Australian and international artists whose work is engaged with critical spatial practice.

An ambitious collection of artistic and written works explored urban interventions concerned with negotiating the increasing fragmentation and complexity of the contemporary city, and developing critical spatial practices that engage in micro-political actions. These works opened up a space in which possibilities for reimagining life in the city could be discussed. A public symposium, off-site projects and a book accompanied the gallery exhibition.

The Right to the City project is continuing with a forthcoming special issue of Architectural Theory Review and plans for a new collaborative space.

Expanded Architecture: International Architectural Film Night, 2010 - ongoing

Expanded Architecture 2010 was a one-night film event at Performance Space, Carriageworks, as part of the Sydney Architecture Festival. Co-curated by Lee Stickells and Sarah Breen Lovett, the event screened over 40 short experimental films investigating architectural themes. A rich selection of filmic exploration saw the intersection of avant-garde film, expanded cinema and architectural concerns. The formal variety, geographic diversity and range of filmmaking practices testified to the broad possibilities for evoking and investigating architecture, and this understanding was extended through a panel discussion.

In 2011, Expanded Architecture will again feature as part of the Sydney Architecture Film Festival, but will be recast as an exhibition of collaborative filmic installations between artists and architects.

Food for Thought, 2009-ongoing

Food for Thought is a migratory, experiential event, made to generate activity in (and stimulate discussion about) our civic spaces, through Sydney and Beyond. A mysterious, metamorphic portmanteau is ritualistically located throughout a series of urban spaces, an active presence, attracting locals with the prospect of free soup. The sharing of food is a primordial human act. The exchange of ideas is central to the vitality of Cities. By bringing these two acts together each Food for Thought event acts both as a catalyst for congregation and an opportunity for members of the public to express themselves in a deliberate and constructive manner.

Urban Islands, 2006-ongoing
Since 2006, the Urban Islands programme has hosted emerging architects and firms from Chile, Costa Rica, Denmark, England, Germany, India, Japan, Peru and the USA. Befitting its location on Cockatoo Island in Sydney Harbour, the program is constructed as an immersive experience, with high expectations on both studio leaders and their students. A collaborative and productive culture is central to the program, informed by participation in an array of events: site visits, installations, presentations, lectures, symposia and the closing day installations and reviews on the island.

architecture 10, 2010
The 2010 instalment of the annual architecture exhibition held at Boutwell Draper Gallery in Sydney, the exhibition featured the 9 international guests who had come to Sydney since 2006 to lead the Urban Islands program on Cockatoo Island, along with the local UI team. The exhibition focussed on the productive media of architecture; that is, those artefacts that architects produce in the process of conceiving, developing, communicating and constructing architecture, be it drawings, models, digital media, writings, etc. The work presented posed a challenge to the ubiquity of the digital production process, and the fetishisation that this practice engenders in the profession and in the media by illustrating the varied creative working processes of each studio (or individual), the equally varied craft that express these methodologies, and the eventual outcomes of the practice, be they building, situation or provocation.

The Shape of Things to Come exhibition, Sydney Customs House 2010
Sydney Architecture Festival 2010 and Art&About 2010
In 2008 a plan for the sustainable development of the City of Sydney for the next 20 years and beyond was created. This plan, Sustainable Sydney 2030, outlines a vision for a green, global and connected city. Through their work, architecture students continue to illustrate, elaborate, explore, and challenge Sustainable Sydney 2030. This is the reason that the City of Sydney commissioned Mark Szczerbicki to curate the exhibition The Shape of Things to Come – Sydney in the Year 2030. The exhibition uses recent student projects to speculate on the future of the city, while an urban narrative connects the project themes and comments on urban and cultural issues facing Sydney now and into the future.

WINDOW/WOUND, 2010
Commissioned by Silvester Fuller Architects, WINDOW/WOUND was a filmic intervention at BMA House in Macquarie Street, Sydney. Fowell and McConnel designed the building for the British Medical Association in 1930, it won the RIBA Award for Street Architecture in 1935 and the RIBA Bronze Medal. The intervention by Lee Stickells and Sarah Breen Lovett explored the rich dynamics of the building’s foyer spaces, re-presenting them to a passing audience on the street.

The wound – a gap – is, like the window, the juncture of interior and exterior. It is a liminal space of rupture but also possibility. Using a site-specific, dual rear-screen projection system, the installation explored this frisson, revealing spatio-temporal slices of BMA House's interiors to the exterior space of the street, through the windows of Studio One. WINDOW/WOUND was screened at the Directors Lounge Media Art Festival, Berlin, in 2011.

Testing Reality exhibition, Sydney Customs House 2009
Sydney Architecture Festival 2009 and Art&About 2009
Designed and curated by Mark Szczerekбиcki to coincide with the 2009 Sydney Architecture Festival, the exhibition explores the changing role of the model in today’s architectural practice. A modernist building designed in the late 1940s by the iconic Australian architect Harry Seidler – the Marcus Seidler House – becomes the focus of a series of architectural models produced especially for the exhibition. The models are supplemented by insights into the behind-the-scenes design processes of some of Europe's leading offices. Images and movies of the work of Jean Nouvel, Bolles+Wilson, EMBT and Delugan Meissl among others reinforce the importance of the physical model in today's globalised digital environment.

Mark Szczerekбиcki

Film/Architecture/Narrative, 2007
Film/Architecture/Narrative was an exhibition of street-based architectural interventions that explored rituals of daily life and the stories we discover in the city. The projects also explore the way film - such a powerful cultural medium - can be engaged in the design and communication of architecture.

Curated by Lee Stickells and Jonathan Mosley, the work on display came from a series of proposed architectural interventions in Spitalfields, East London. Springing from intensive site studies and documentation of daily life in the area, the interventions were designed to alter, enhance or respond to the ritual behaviour of particular street users. Large-scale models as well as videos and image sequences were used to create accessible, engaging and three dimensional representations of the projects - using media well understood by many audiences.

Lee Stickells
Red Blue Passage, 2006

Red Blue Passage utilises the sculptural potentials of existing urban artefacts to present a rich, delightful, nocturnal display. Contrasting colours highlight volume and composition, and the colouration within the existing light fixtures directly opposes the phlegmatic white of urban formality. The viewer is encouraged to engage with the altered scale and perspective of the night, and of the possibilities and unexpected beauty of the city’s servant spaces and elements. It is intended that the ephemeral yet monumental scale of Red Blue Passage will linger with people long after it has been extinguished.

Michael Lewarne

Mackenzie’s Event Horizon, 2006

This site specific work continues the conceptual exploration of the “Sculpture by the Sea” locale undertaken in the three previous works made for the event. In this piece the perception of the site and its scale is manipulated through light, with the work examining the boundary, or Event Horizon, of the coastline.

An ephemeral and intangible work, it conceived the use of syncopated flashes of light upon the cliff face; sometimes consecutive, or coinciding, or seemingly independent. The illusiveness of the fleeting flashes of light generate a shifted perspective of scale and understanding of the site, with the intent to provoke the viewer into questioning what they are viewing.

Temple of the Catalogue, Caveat Emptor (2005)

Curation, construction and production of multi-gallery, multi-artist show about the dangers of shopping at a distance. Despite the promises of the catalogue, things are never what they seem: the buyers retain their secrets.

Curation and production of multi-disciplinary, multi-artist show, and construction of 16 indexical works footnoting the installations in the final exhibition. The index works, the Books, were composed from recordings of the performances and the detritus of the artists’ work, and referenced the final works as well as the original tarot cards that were the starting point for the explorations.
